In the Ancient Greek period, artists made different art works, in these art works, they used different tools and materials got from their environment. The activities carried out in their community guided them on which type of art works they produced. The art works made, would even show the different periods they had gone through, most of the art works were decorative and some functional.

However, today's artists, many of them produce decorated art works, the works are not functional, they simply produce works for their economic values as seen in figures below.

Recently the S.4 Geography class went to western Uganda. On their way back they made a stopover at Nabusanke (Equator) crafts center. The bus driver who had no knowledge of art entered one of the many craft shops and saw some art works that amused him. They were expensive for him to buy but managed to take their photos as in figure 5 and 6. On returning home, he tried to make such art works referring to the photos but failed since he never knew the ways of doing it.
